Starting from 7 March 2024, the gatekeepers designated by the European Commission under the Digital Markets Act (DMA) are called to comply with the obligations under this new regulatory framework. Both business users and end users should be able to see and profit from tangible change in gatekeepers' practices. Questions around how to enforce the DMA are joined by new ones: Is it working? How can compliance with the rules be assessed? Is the regulatory dialogue leading to good results? What does the evidence say about enforcement? What are the main procedural challenges?

Regulators and gatekeepers will continue to face novel issues in this crucial first year of enforcement. They need to interpret and apply the DMA in a way that guarantees its full potential and leads to the achievement of its main goals, amid ongoing debate over which goals should prevail and guide enforcement. And now that gatekeepers are responding (or not), regulators have more to assess and eventually impose. The simple fact that less than a month from 'compliance day' the European Commission decided to investigate Apple, Google, and Meta over failing to follow new digital rules shows that successful enforcement is not an easy task, and far from granted.

ARTICLE 19, with the support of the Amsterdam Centre for European Law and Governance, the Hertie School Centre for Digital Governance, Université de Namur, and the University of Trento, are excited to be organising our second annual DMA enforcement symposium.

This year's edition will see invited scholars present and discuss their research with European Commission officials dealing with the enforcement of the DMA and other stakeholders. We are honoured to be able to facilitate a direct and ongoing dialogue between scholars and regulators.
